Sachs-Pruden's.

On account of the great popularity of our unrivalled brand of SACHS-PRUDEN'S, and the favor it has met with all over the world, a large number of unprincipled manufacturers are making a so-called Ginger Ale (ordinary Ginger "Pop"), most of which is put up in exact imitation of our package—in order to deceive.

We also find a great many dealers who sell this class of goods when our ALE is called for, because their profits are larger on inferior brands. When you want our ALE, call for SACHS-PRUDEN'S. Demand to see the bottle, and don't be deceived.

THE GREAT TONIC.

A most excellent and agreeable medicine for the cure of indigestion dyspepsia, and all other diseases of a disordered stomach and liver. The curative properties are largely attributed to its stimulant, tonic and nutritive qualities, whereby the various organic functions are recruited. Its actions are immediate, producing at once a feeling of buoyancy to the intellect, removing depression or melancholy, and hence it is of great value in the treatment of mental and nervous affections. From its admirable composition, its use is indicated in a wide range of diseases. It contains blood-making, force-generating, and life-sustaining properties, pre-eminently calculated to support the system under the exhausting and wasting process of fevers and other acute diseases. It rebuilds and recruits the tissues, and forces, whether lost in the destructive march of such affections, or induced by overwork or general debility from most tedious forms of chronic diseases. PANORAMA OF 'THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG.

The Confederate government had always been eager to carry the contest into Northern territory! It was satisfying to the natural pride of the South, and it was thought that some experience of the evils of war might incline the Northern mind to peace. Lee was ordered to march into Pennsylvania. He gathered all the troops at his disposal, and with seventy-five thousand men he crossed the Potomac, and was once more prepared to face the enemy on his own soil. The rich cities of the North trembled. It was not unlikely that he would possess himself of Baltimore and Philadelphia. Could he once again defeat Hooker's army, as he had often done before, no further resistance was possible. Pennsylvania and New York were at his mercy.

Lee advanced to the little Pennsylvania town of Gettysburg. Hooker, after marching his army northward, had been relieved of his command. A battle was near; and in face of the enemy a new commander had to be chosen. Two days before the hostile armies met, General Meade was appointed. Meade was an experienced soldier, who had filled with honor the various positions assigned him. It was seemingly a hopeless task which he was now asked to perform. With an oft-defeated army of sixty thousand to seventy thousand men, to whom he was a stranger, he had to meet Lee with his victorious seventy-five thousand. Meade quietly undertook the work appointed to him, and did it, too, like a brave, prudent, unpretending man.

The battle lasted for three days. On the first day the Confederates had some advantage. Their attack broke and scattered a Federal division with considerable loss. But that night the careful Meade took up a strong position on a crescent-shaped line of heights near the little town.

Next day Lee attempted to dislodge the enemy. The key of the Federal position was Cemetery Hill, and there the utmost strength of the Confederate attack was put forth. Nor was it in vain. Part of the Federal line was broken. At one point an important position had been taken by the Confederates. Lee might fairly hope that another day's fighting would complete his success and give him undisputed possession of the wealthiest Northern States. His loss had been small, while the Federals had been seriously weakened.

Perhaps no hours of deeper gloom were ever passed in the North than the hours of that summer evening, when the telegraph flashed over the country the news of Lee's success. The lavish sacrifice of blood and treasure seemed in vain. A million of men were in arms to defend the Union; and yet the northward progress of the enemy could not be withstood. Should Lee be victorious on the morrow, the most hopeful must despond.

The day on which so much of the destiny of America hung opened bright and warm and still. The morning was occupied by Lee in preparations for a crushing attack upon the center of the Federal position; by Meade, in carefully strengthening his power of resistance at the point where he was to win

BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG.

THE Panorama represents the decisive action which took place in the afternoon of July 3, 1863—the third day of the battle, generally known as the charge of Pickett. At one o'clock in the afternoon, the signal cannon shot was given, and one hundred and fifteen guns of the Confederates opened fire against the troops commanded by General Hancock, consisting of the first corps, under the command of Newton; the second corps, under Gibbon, and the third, under Birney, against the eleventh corps, under Howard. The aim of the artillery fire was to break the Northern lines, and prepare the way for Pickett's charge. It had been found expedient to divide the first corps. The division of Wadsworth was on the right at Culp's Hill; the divisions of Robinson, Gibbon, Doubleday and Caldwell were ranged successively on the left. The convex form of the Northern lines did not give them as much space as that occupied by the Southern troops. General Hunt, in command of the artillery, promptly stationed eighty guns along the crest—as many as it would hold—in order to respond to the fire. On both sides the artillery suffered greatly during the two hours that the cannonade lasted. Eleven ammunition wagons exploded. When the smoke of these explosions cleared, the shouts of joy from the Southern soldiers could be heard for miles along the line.

At three o'clock in the afternoon, General Hunt ordered a cessation of fire in order to cool the guns, and reserve a little ammunition for the struggle which seemed imminent. This cessation of fire naturally gave the Southerners an idea that they had silenced the Northern batteries, and Pickett at once moved forward in order to break the Union line, and occupy the crest. The attack was so important, so sudden, and so contrary to the provisions of Longstreet, that when Pickett demanded an order to advance, Longstreet gave no reply; then Pickett said haughtily, "I shall go forward, sir."

The other forces on his right and left were to wove up and enlarge the opening thus made, in such a way that finally the two wings of the Union army would be completely wedged apart, so permanently and effectually that they would disperse in all directions. It is supposed that this grand column of attack numbered about 17,000 men.

The distance to be traversed by Pickett's column was about a mile and a half from the woods where they started to the crest, which was his objective point. During the time which it necessarily took to organize and cross this intervening space, Hunt wisely improved the opportunity to withdraw the disabled batteries, and replace them by others from the reserve artillery. He also replenished the boxes of ammunition, and held himself ready to receive Pickett's column, first with bullet shots, followed by bomb shells, and finally when close to hand, explode boxes of grape shot. While crossing the open plain, the Southerners suffered cruelly from this artillery, which opened on them with solid shot the moment they came in sight, followed by shell when half way across the plain, double canisters being reserved for their nearer approach.

NOTE.—In compiling this brief sketch of the Battle of Gettysburg, we are indebted largely to General Doubleday in his excellent little book, published by Scribner's Sons, "Chancellorsville and Gettysburg."

From the very start, the direction of their march appeared to be directly toward the Doubleday division, but when they were within five hundred yards of it, Pickett halted, and changed the direction for an oblique of almost forty-five degrees; the attack thus struck Gibbon's division, which was on the right of Doubleday. Wilcox and Lang, who formed the right flank of Pickett; did not follow his oblique movement, but kept on straight to the front, in such a manner that soon there was a vast interval between their troops and the main body, thus leaving Pickett's right completely unguarded.

The Southerners came on magnificently; as soon as the shot and shell tore through their lines they closed up the gaps, and pushed on. When they reached to Emmetsburg road the canister began to make frightful gaps in their ranks. They also suffered severely from a battery posted on the summit of Little Round Top, which pierced their lines.

The attack of Pickett struck Hays' brigade and the second corps in front of the main line. Then the musketry became so deadly that Pettigrew's men began to hesitate on the left and fall behind. Before the Southerners could reach the second fence and stone wall, they were obliged to pass under the fire of a half brigade commanded by Colonel Thomas B. Gates, of the 20th New York State militia, and a Vermont brigade under General Stannard, both belonging to the corps of Doubleday.

When the right of Pickett became exposed by the divergence movement of Wilcox's command, Stannard seized the opportunity to make a flank attack, and while his regiment on the left, the 14th, was making a terrible fire, he changed front with his two other regiments, the 13th and 16th, and thus brought them in a line perpendicular to the Southern troops, and the brigade of Kemper found itself repulsed, and driven toward the center in order to avoid the energetic and deadly attack of Stannard.

They were followed by Gates' command, who continued firing with close ranks. This resulted in the surrender of many. Others forced a retreat. Meantime the brigade of Armistead joined with that of Garnett, charged on 2nd corps of Hays' brigade, and forced them back from their advance position against the stone wall, just as the batteries of the crest arrived. Although Webb's front was the center of the concentrated fire of the artillery, and had already lost fifty men and several brilliant officers, their line remained firm and impenetrable. It devolved upon Webb to meet the great charge which was to decide the fate of the day. For that unforeseen circumstance it would have been difficult to find a man better fitted. He was nerved to great deeds by the memory of his ancestors who had formerly rendered distinguished services to the republic, and he felt that the results of the whole war might depend upon his holding of the position. His men were equally determined. Cushing's battery No. 4 of the United States artillery, which had been posted on the crest, and Brown's battery, Rhode Island, on his left, were completely destroyed by the cannonade. The horses were killed, the officers, with the exception of one only, were struck with fragments of shell, and Cushing had but one serviceable gun left. When Pickett's advance came very near the line, young Cushing, mortally wounded in both thighs, ran his last serviceable gun down to the fence and cried, "Webb, I will give them one more shot." At that moment of the last discharge he called out, "Good bye!" and fell dead at his post of duty. Webb sent new batteries to replace the two disabled ones. Gen. Armistead crossed the stone wall and reached the guns, and the battery was, for a few moments, in his possession and the Southern flag floated triumphantly in the Union lines. But Webb was very near, and facing Armistead and encouraging his men. He led the 72d regiment of Pennsylvania against Pickett, and posted a line of wounded in the rear with the orders to shoot all men who deserted. A party of the 71st Pennsylvania, behind a stone wall at the right, made a very murderous fire at the flank, while a party of the 69th Pennsylvania and the remainder of the 71st made an energetic resistance at the left from behind a clump of trees, near the spot where the Southerners had broken the Union line, and where the Northern men were fighting with the Southern muskets touching their breasts. At this moment two regiments conducted by Colonel Hall made a splendid charge and passed completely across Webb's line to engage with the Southerners in a hand-to-hand conflict. Armistead was mortally wounded near a cannon which he had taken. It is said that when dying his last words, which were addressed to one of our officers, were, "Tell Hancock I have wronged him and have wronged my country." Gibbon and Webb were both wounded, and the loss of officers and men was very considerable. Two Southern brigadier-generals were killed, and the number of prisoners was double the number of Webb's brigade. Six battle flags and 1,463 muskets were also taken.

When Pickett looked about him and saw that it was impossible to hold his position as he was surrounded by Northern soldiers—saw his men surrender in a body—heartbroken he ordered the retreat.

Few men remained of that magnificent column which had advanced so proudly, led by the Ney of the Southern army, and these few fell back in disorder behind Wright's brigade which had been sent forward to cover the retreat. On the left Pettigrew's division lost 2,000.

THE ONLY ONE IN THE WORLD

CYCLORAMA BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG.

PICKETT'S CHARGE AT BLOODY ANGLE.

The above cuts are taken from the Cyclorama Battle of Gettysburg at the Soldiers' Home which now has the signal distinction of being the only piece of work of its kind now in existence either in this country or abroad.

The next Fourth of July marks the twentieth anniversary of its completion and during those years in which it has been on exhibition, nearly half a million people have gazed upon its inspiring scenes.

The original cost of this stupendous production was $35,000, and improvements to the extent of $10,000 have been recently made. These have been largely in the way of silhouettes and electrical effects which add a realism that defies description, and it must positively be seen to be appreciated.

Until quite recently the price of admission charged, was 50 cents, but notwithstanding the large amount of money expended for improvements it has been reduced to the popular price of 25 cents; children, 15 cents.

The Battle of Gettysburg is on exhibition every day in the week including Sunday, from 9 a. m. to 10 p. m.

"BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG," VIEWED BY THOUSANDS, DISMANTLED BY WRECKERS

DAYTON DAILY NEWS
JULY 1927

The "Battle of Gettysburg" is being torn down. The man who had charge of the "Battle" is being sent away to the demented ward in the twilight of his last days. On the first day of July, 64 years ago, the battle began. On Friday, this year, the "Battle" is being attacked by the hammers and sledges of wreckers. And oddly enough, the same thing that oppresses us today is what apparently most impressed the soldiers on that historic occasion.

As you get off the car at Lakeside park, you will see the great building, the "Cycle-drama of the Battle of Gettysburg." It consists of a panoramic representation of the conflict. It was completed in 1888 at a reputed cost of $175,000. Two thousand men are said to have labored at it. A Daytonian, F. Loudenachlager, had it built. Marion Knight, of Miami co., was the artist.

The old keeper of the "Battle of Gettysburg" was a veteran named Emory Willis. Several months ago he was taken to the demented ward. He himself was born in the village of Gettysburg. His father fought in the battle, and he, as a lad, saw most of it. He joined the ranks shortly thereafter. He could tell the inquiring visitor all about the battle. It was his hobby. Now that the old building is being torn down, perhaps he would prefer not to know it.

One of his comrades at the home, Alfred P. McGuire, fought in the battle. Sixty-four years ago Friday, he stood by his cannon at Cemetery Hill and poured shot into the Confederates. And strangely, the thing that he thought about most on that day was the same thing he was thinking about when questioned about the battle.

"What do you remember most distinctly about the battle?" he was asked.

"The heat," he said laconically. And then added, "It was hot!"

"It wasn't like most battles," he went on. "Usually there's a time before the battle when you have time to think and get scared and wish you were out of there and so on. But at Gettysburg we were into the battle before we knew it. There wasn't time to think. No time to do anything, but fight."

"I was in the first corps under Reynolds. We were the first to run into the Rebel column. We just ran right into them and had to fight for it. I was driving the lead team to the caisson of the first piece. The Rebel cavalry opened on us from Seminary Hill and we wheeled in the wheat field and fought 'em right there. Reynolds laid down his line of battle and his life right there in the wheat field."

"And believe me it was some fighting. We fought like a boat load of wildcats. Perhaps that was what made the Rebs think there was more of us. I've heard it said that there were more killed on that first day at Gettysburg than on any other single day of the war."

"You know, if the Rebels had known it, they could have walked right through us that first day. They thought our whole army was there. And there was just one corps, the First. The Eleventh corps came up during the afternoon."

"Reynolds was killed. Hancock moved our line to Cemetery Ridge. Hancock was the man at Gettysburg. He was the fellow that won the battle. He was the man that just naturally made Meade rush the whole army to the battle."

"Even on the morning of the second day, the Rebels could still have walked right through us. But it was Hancock again, that saved the day. He didn't have the men but he pretended that he did. He spread his line out as thin as he could and ordered Buford to parade his cavalry up and down on the left flank, making the Rebels think we had a much stronger force than we really did have. And he made the soldiers that were there fight like the devil. We had to fire enough for two batteries."

If Longstreet had attacked then on that morning of the second day—if he had attacked in force, the South would have won the Battle of Gettysburg. England would have recognized the South and there would have been no victory for the Union. I've heard it said, that for this reason Gettysburg was one of the seven great battles of all time.

But Longstreet was fooled by Hancock's tactics.

In the afternoon of the second day, Lee ordered a great attack. But by that time the Third corps and the Twelfth and the Second had come up. And the Sixth had marched 36 miles straight out to get to the battle. They were late, but they came in handy.

"I was on Cemetery Hill holding my horses, when the cannonading preceding the attack began. And at every shot the horses reared and plunged, with me hanging on to their bits. And what with holding the horses and serving the guns and galloping to the rear for ammunition, I put in the hottest day's fighting I ever saw."

"The third day came, and in the morning we had time to think a little. All our troops had come up and the two full armies faced each other. Nobody knew what would happen."

"And then about noon their cannons woke up all at once and hell broke loose. And we knew something was coming. They had our position and our range and they poured it into us, but we shifted and pulled up some new guns."

"And then Pickett's charge came. We fired double charges of canister all the rest of the battle. Work? I never worked so in my life. Horses rearing and shells falling and the gunners yelling for canister, canister! We poured Reynolds. We were the first to run into the Rebel column. We just ran right into them and had to fight for it. I was driving the lead team to the caisson of the first piece. The Rebel cavalry opened on us from Seminary Hill and we wheeled in the wheat field and fought 'em right there. Reynolds laid down his line of battle and his life right there in the wheat field."

"And believe me it was some fighting. We fought like a boat load of wildcats. Perhaps that was what made the Rebs think there was more of us. I've heard it said that there were more killed on that first day at Gettysburg than on any other single day of the war."

"You know, if the Rebels had known it, they could have walked right through us that first day. They thought our whole army was there. And there was just one corps, the First. The Eleventh corps came up during the afternoon."

"Reynolds was killed. Hancock moved our line to Cemetery Ridge. Hancock was the man at Gettysburg. He was the fellow that won the battle. He was the man that just naturally made Meade rush the whole army to the battle."

Seventy-Five Years Ago Dayton Celebrated Gettysburg Victory, Turning Point of the Civil War

Former Military Home Resident Describes Bitter Fighting

By LEWIS W. CARL

Seventy-five years ago tonight, men waited tensely at the telegraph office at the Baker house for news of the great battle that was being fought. At dawn came the word, "Pickett's charge was defeated." And then that other battle, "Grant's victory at Vicksburg." Population has since multiplied.

People go on and on, but the battle of Gettysburg was the first battle of the war in which the Union army was victorious. It was the first battle in which the Union army was victorious. It was the first battle in which the Union army was victorious.

SOUTH'S "HIGH WATER MARK"

Many daytons remember the great painting of the battle of Gettysburg, a great attraction at Lakeside park until 1927. This picture shows about one-seventh of the great work. It is made up of two of the only known remaining photographs of the painting and shows the high water mark of the Confederacy with captured Southern prisoners and colors being returned through the lines. The cyclorama was housed in a great circular building and showed all of the last day's fighting with men and horses painted life-size. The original painting perished in a fire in 1929.

Great Cyclorama

It was more than 40 miles long, while Lee had but his forces together. If Lee and Longstreet had attacked in force that day, they could have annihilated the Blues, corps by corps, and region by region.

As Alfred P. McGuire, a former resident of the National Military Home, told the writer, it was in the first corps under Reynolds and we were in the battle before we knew it. We just ran right into the Rebel column and had to fight them right there. They opened on us from Seminary hill and we wheeled our guns in the wheat field and opened up. It was the most terrible battle I ever saw. The Rebels were fighting in a line of battle and we were fighting in a line of battle. The Rebels were fighting in a line of battle and we were fighting in a line of battle.

DAYTON - PARKS & PLAYGROUNDS

---LAKESIDE PARK

LAKESIDE CIRCUSES

Its 49th Anniversary

By A. S. Hany

JOHN HANCOCK, 49, on the threshold of his golden anniversary of its founding, Lakeside park, one of the oldest outdoor amusement resorts in the country and probably the oldest in the state of Ohio, is preparing a jubilee program of events for the closing days of the summer season.

This year marks the 49th anniversary of the popular amusement resort, which has the distinction of having been in continuous operation since its opening, furnishing clean amusement to thousands upon thousands of patrons of at least three generations.

In the amusement world to have conducted a park through all these years is indeed an achievement. For Ohio has been alternately good and bad and always this is reflected in the patronage of a summer park.

Then, too, revolutionary changes in modes of travel have not been conducive to park attendance and many have faded because they could not, with their attractions, counteract the inroads made by such changes.

A generation or more ago it was a common sight to see train loads of patrons come streaming into Dayton and switch to the park for a Sunday's outing. And if the day were a particularly hot one, it wasn't only the train that did the steaming.

Perishing dads and mothers, bringing more or less unruly offspring, made the park their goal and though they were worn to the proverbial frazzle by evening, they departed for home happy and content that they had given their youngsters a big time.

Came the automobile, and summer parks in many instances went into the discard. The ability to ride long distances made it almost impossible for folks to stay put. Yet Lakeside kept right on transacting business at the old stand year after year, nearly always with turnover enough to justify its existence.

Had the owners become panicky like those of some other parks, there might be a different story to tell. Instead, they remained calm and unperturbed, kept their park up to a high standard of beauty and efficiency, adding new attractions from year to year and today still exist with one of the best little investments in the state.

The region in which the park is located was nothing more than a cornfield adjoining the National Military home when the late James Kirk purchased the land from the Howell-Applegate family with the intention of establishing a park on the site.

These families owned a large tract of land in the vicinity of the park and the old Howell home, a brick house built in the fanciful style of that era, still stands on the Germantown pike. But few attractions comprised the park's outlay when it was opened by Kirk. In that unpretentious era it took only a few simple amusements to attract people who had not yet been spoiled by the variety that was soon to transform the whole entertainment field. And early patrons of the park found their fun principally on a merry-go-round and a "switchback."

The latter antedated the roller coaster and figure eight of today, consisting of an undulating track from here to there in a straight line over which the cars slipped at what was then considered a breath-taking pace. Designers of such devices had not yet figured out how to keep the cars from flying off at a tangent so there were no curves to negotiate.

From year to year other riding devices were installed as they were invented. Foremost among these was the chute, in which one roared down a steep incline in a boat that hit the water at the base with a great splash. When this was in operation the center portion of the park was converted into a lake.

The most pretentious amusement in the park was the immense cyclorama of the Battle of Gettysburg, which was originally owned by the father of the present owner. It was painted three or four years ago and was draped around in a circle within the building housing them and the house itself built up so that the spectator, standing on a platform in the center, viewed the entire battleground as he viewed it in various directions.

The other two cycloramas were set up at Atlanta and Gettysburg, where they still stand. E. J. Lauterbach, who purchased the park from Kirk in 1913, razed the structure about 10 years ago because it was a fire hazard, but offered to turn the picture over to the government because of its educational value.

Col. Wadsworth, a member of the home board, endeavored to interest the government, proposing that a concrete building be erected for about $25,000, and a small admission charged until it was paid for.

Your Uncle Sam couldn't see it that way, so the material was stored in a local storage plant that burned up a few years ago, taking the precious canvas with it.

Lauterbach operated the park until his death in 1927, when it passed into the hands of his nephew, Gerald Niemann, who has since carried it forward on the same 400-acre plot as his predecessors.

A particularly bright spot in the Lakeside park of former days was the vaudeville theater that offered nightly bills for the small sum of 10 cents.

For here many of the individuals and acts that later made the big time in theaters throughout the country had their start or made early appearances, vaudeville in those days being a real "going concern."

No brighter luminary emanated from Lakeside than the late Marilyn Miller, who became one of the greatest stars of the musical comedy field under the guidance of the late Flo Ziegfeld.

Marilyn was but a youngster of four or five when she made her first appearance with her father and mother and sister at Lakeside. Dressed in a chic little suit, she was placed back of a large vase until her cue for entrance.

But Marilyn, tired from the dry's playing, fell asleep at her burg, which was originally owned by the father of the present owner and her twinkling eyes before long began to haunt her advent into theatrical fame. She was only one of many who appeared at the park but old-timers who knew her and her family, still refer to the days when "Sugar Lump," as they nicknamed her, made her debut at Lakeside.

Lakeside Enters Second Half-Century

Journal-Herald, April 6/41

By A. S. Hany

In the days when grandpappy was a babe in arms there was a Lakeside park. There's a Lakeside park today and, paraphrasing the words of a popular song a bit, probably there'll always be a Lakeside park. Notable is the fact that when this popular summer amusement resort swings open its gates next Saturday for the 1941 spring season, it will be entering upon the second half-century of its existence.

Few parks there are in the country as old as this one or that have been able to survive the onrush of time with its myriad of new attractions, foremost among them, perhaps, the automobile and the movies.

Yet here for 50 years, summer in and summer out, Lakeside park has operated while others have fallen by the wayside, doling itself up a bit each succeeding season and keeping up a generally attractive appearance from year to year.

Next Saturday the present manager, Gerald Niermann, throws the park open for the spring season, operating on week-ends until Memorial day when all attractions will be open daily and nightly.

Gerald, a good-looking lad who registers in that category the society folks dub as eligible, has been hibernating at the park during the winter months but at the same time he's busied himself with planning improvements and getting them translated into action as much as the weather would permit, so that the park will present a number of new things this season.

New Ball Room

Principal among these is the redecorated ballroom, of which Gerald is justly proud. You may not know it, or may not have supposed to realize it, but the ballroom at Lakeside is the largest in the state of Ohio and one of the best equipped.

This season it has been redecorated the "Victory Room," and to further fall into the trend of things has been redecorated in our national colors. Omar Rich had charge of the work and he has done an excellent job.

Lighting is particularly effective for it comes from clusters of huge, ornate chandeliers that look like baskets of patriotic strawberries, surrounded by blue lanterns decorated with white stars.

and about are other lanterns of patriotic hue, while the large wall spaces have been painted largely in white to give a further illusion of immensity.

When you go out there, as you must to hear the big-name bands that will be playing there this summer, take notice of the gorgeous wall panels, illustrating dancers of various nationalities against flaming orange backgrounds. Russian, Dutch, Latin, Scottish, western and others are beautifully done.

Gerald is opening the season Saturday and Sunday nights with a band that has become quite familiar over the air but as far as we can ascertain, has not appeared in Dayton, that of Al Kavelin.

Kavelin is the author of that BMI tune so frequently heard these days, "I Give You My Word," and he himself is a fine musician with a sound musical education, a graduate of the Royal Verdi conservatory in Milan, Italy, who launched upon a career as a concert violinist shortly after returning to this country.

Then he organized his own orchestra and was a success from the date of his first appearance at the Hotel Lexington in New York. Though highly appreciative of the classics, the word is that Al has learned how to blend the classical into popular music without losing the flavor of the compositions that the masters have handed down to posterity. At the same time he is not averse to meeting the popular taste for swing, tangos, boleros and rumbas.

New Park Attractions

Of course, the ballroom isn't all there is of Lakeside park, for nearly a score of attractions vie for favor among the young folks looking for a thrill.

And this year the management has taken cognizance of the popularity of the airplane by installing a new one called Flying Bombers. This is built on the general principle of the little cars that fly around in a circle, suspended from a cable, with the difference, however, that the operator, by means of a car can manipulate the car and by thus directing the angle of his scooter vary his altitude from a few inches of the ground to the very top of the 50-foot boom supporting the structure.

Thus each operator becomes an airplane pilot without the attendant danger of falling to the ground when the motor stalls.

One of the sad features this year is that the familiar Old Mill, where many a Daytonian has wooed his sweetheart and stolen a kiss as the flat-bottomed boats glided through the dark canals, is to be torn out.

After all, it has become a little slow for this modern age, where there is no such thing as oscillatory hesitancy, and the park needs more parking space for automobiles. That's what this space and that back of it formerly devoted to wrestling matches will become.

But there will be plenty of other amusements, for listed in the round-up are the wild cat, volplane, whoopee, octopus, scooter, pretzel, cuddle-up and that old standby, the merry-go-round, with sizes for both kiddies and grown-ups. Symbol of amusement the world over, the carousel still remains a major money maker.

New Park Slogan

Manager Niermann has even given the park a new slogan this year: "When it's amusement, it's Lakeside."

But that is only stating in terse terms what has been going on at this spot for half a century. Long years ago, when trainloads of excursionists came to Lakeside and the "Soldiers Home" to spend a wonderful Sunday or holiday, the park boasted few amusements.

There was, of course, the merry-go-round and a sort of "switch back," which antedated the roller coaster and sent its cars on a straight track back and forth since designers had not yet learned how to keep them from flying off at a tangent if sent around a curve.

When the late James Kirk purchased the ground for the park adjacent to the new home, it was nothing more than a cornfield and it was considered far far from the center of town. Like as not, the boys, who shot their heads and wondered what Jim Kirk wanted with a park out there so nowhere.

But the home grounds and the home band concerts drew visitors from miles around and as years passed the park increased its attractions and today is one of the best in the country. Many Daytonians will recall the thyme, the chutes, wherein a car rushed down an incline into a lake. At one time there were any number of these about the country, but today only one remains, in Long park at Coney Island, New York.

Other Daytonians will recall the 10-cent vaudeville theater that flourished at the park, where many of the standard acts of the day earned a bit of summer coin and where one of the brightest musical comedy stars the stage has ever seen made her first appearance as a youngster, Marilyn Miller. "Sugar Lump" they called her in those days. Afterwards, Flo Ziegfeld took her in hand and made her one of the biggest stars.

Recalled, too, will be the immense cycloramas that used to house the "Battle of Gettysburg," a remarkable painting show the battlefield and the two armies struggling thereon, with the foreground realistically made up with figures and guns to blend in with the painting. When it was removed because the building was considered a fire hazard, proposal was made that it be housed in a concrete building at the home at government expense, but Uncle Sam wouldn't put up a paltry $25,000 for the purpose. In these days that wouldn't be pin money. So the treasure was put in storage and several years later burned up in a fire.

Three of these cycloramas were painted by an Italian artist, the others being set up in Atlanta and Gettysburg. A couple of years ago they were reported as still in existence.

The park passed into the hands of E. J. Lauterbach upon the death of Mr. Kirk and he operated it until 1927, when, at his death, it passed into the hands of his nephew, Gerald Niermann, who has since carried it along on the same high plane as his predecessors.

Perhaps you've been neglecting Lakeside park in your round of amusements. If so, take a ride out there when the season is opened. Between rides you can refresh yourself at a new, enlarged hot dog stand or orange drink counter, test your skill in a new penny arcade, and then take a few steps on the smooth ballroom floor, provided you get there when a band is playing.

While full season bookings of bands cannot be made so early in the season, you can rest assured that no name band of consequence will pass through this territory without Gerald Niermann getting it signed up for an appearance in the beautiful new Victory room at Lakeside.

THIS ONE IS for Daytonians who lived around here at least 30 years ago . . . who remember the roundhouse painting of the Battle of Gettysburg that used to be a great Sunday afternoon attraction at the Soldiers' Home . . .

Alfred Mongin, librarian of the Gettysburg National Military Park at Gettysburg, Pa., writes that he is preparing a history of the cyclorama painting of "Pickett's Charge" in the battle of Gettysburg which is exhibited at this park by the national park service, U. S. department of interior.

We called ours the roundhouse painting because you paid your money at the door and then went in a big, round shadowy room and stood on a railed platform in the middle. The illuminated painting, was in colors, all around the wall, and if you turned slowly, slowly, it seemed as if you were in the midst of the battle.

Paintings like these are properly called cyclorama and, as Mongin explains, they're on canvases of large dimensions. "Ours measures 30 feet in height and 370 feet in circumference. It's mounted in the shape of a cylinder—the spectator standing in the middle is surrounded by the scene of the painting.

"Our cyclorama is credited to the French painter, Paul Dominique Philippoteau. One of the painters who is supposed to have worked with him is Marion Knight who, about 1888, painted a similar cyclorama, of the same scene, which was exhibited about 1888 until after 1920 near the Soldiers' Home at Dayton."

Yes, that's the one we saw here. (But, I feel called upon to say that I did not see it, personally, until around 1919—because I didn't arrive on this planet until AFTER the 1913 flood, my critics to the contrary!)

Now, here's what Mongin's getting at—he wants to know if anybody around here remembers anything about Marion Knight, the painter. If you do, write to Alfred Mongin, historian, Gettysburg National Military Park, Gettysburg, Pa., and he'll be very grateful for your information . . .

WHAT happened to Dayton's Cyclorama? As interest in the Civil War intensifies, many Daytonians will recall with pleasure the giant, circular canvas that turned the Battle of Gettysburg into a personal experience.

"You grabbed a picnic lunch, asked your Dad for a quarter and took a trolley to the round house near the Soldiers Home."

The canvas gave Gettysburg Ave. its name. What became of it has remained a mystery to most Daytonians.

Some say it was sold to Japan, where it became a study in military strategy.

"I saw it," claims a Dayton woman. "It is at Gettysburg."

Still others insist it went up in smoke, in a warehouse fire. In a way all three views are right. For there were at least three cycloramas of the Battle of Gettysburg, reports R. Russell Miller, 2161 Ravenwood Ave., who has made a lifelong study of the subject.

Even more important he claims to have the only colored replica of the Dayton painting. His claim is backed by a copyright.

THE CYCLORAMA has touched off scores of arguments. Actually, Dayton's famed canvas, Miller has found, was contracted for by a man named Marion Knight, former lieutenant on Hayes' staff. A Miami colonian, Knight, with a friend named George Clyde and two Civil War veterans, David Lee and William Evans, organized "Cyclorama, Inc." They planned the canvas sometime before 1888 (for it was first shown July 4 of that year). And they started it at a time Gettysburg was alive in the minds of many throughout the country.

The company hired a group of German immigrant artists headed by a man named Frederick Wilhelm Heine and directed by Wilhelm Werner. They painted it in Chicago. The artists were well organized. Each was an expert. One was a horse painter, another an action man. Others knew uniforms or battle strategy.

The group painted the Battle of Atlanta and the Battle of Lookout Mountain as well as many pastoral scenes. And there is evidence they split up and some painted on their cyclorama of the Battle of Gettysburg. (This was believed to have wound up in Japan where it was studied by military strategists.)

The era of the cyclorama preceded the era of the movie. Everyone got into the act. One cyclorama of a Mississippi river scene stretched to three miles in length. It unrolled to give viewers the illusion they were moving.

Before the Heine group had finished its cyclorama a French artist, Paul Philippiteaux, somehow managed to scoop them. He worked from sketches and charts. He hired French models in his studio and managed to complete his Frenchified version of the battle before the Dayton-sponsored work was ready.

The Philippiteaux work "opened" in Boston, before Dayton's was seen.

"The Philippiteaux canvas smacks too much of France," Miller explained. "French flags appear in it. Instead of his name the famous French artist (who painted the Battle of Waterloo) puts himself in a corner under a tree."

ARGUMENTS still rage over who copied whom. Meanwhile a third cyclorama (later sold to Japan) made its appearance.

The Philippiteaux canvas appeared at the St. Louis Exposition and in Chicago.

Miller, who naturally favors the Dayton work, claims it is much more authentic than the Frenchman's canvas.

Mrs. Henry Hunt, widow of the general, visited the St. Louis Exposition in company with Alice Roosevelt Longworth. There is a story that she looked at the cyclorama and exclaimed loudly, "That doesn't look like the general at all. If you want to see how Henry looked see the Dayton Cyclorama."

Thousands did. They returned again and again. They walked down a runway to the center of the round house and looked at the colorful battle scene, bathed in light. A platform with life-size iron men and real weapons gave a 3-D effect to the work. Military men criticized the positions of the cannon until it was pointed out that the shape of the canvas put parts of the picture out of the perspective.

George Lautenschlager, a druggist, purchased a corner that included the round house. He and his son continued the exhibit.

"Harry Lautenschlager helped earn his medical education lecturing on it," Miller explained. "In fact he became such an expert on the battle that he was asked to do the commentary on the Philippiteaux canvas at the St. Louis Exposition."

taker a cigar if he would let me in. I spent days making color charts and drawings. I also hired a photographer to copy every inch of the canvas. We finished just three days before the canvas was scheduled to come down."

This was a lucky decision for Miller whose interest in history stemmed from childhood and prompted him to teach it. Life approached the wrecking company head and inquired about the canvas. He decided to raise some money to preserve it.

One night he heard a fire alarm and saw an orange cloud over the warehouse where he knew it had been stored. He raced to the building but found it demolished.

Miller hired several Dayton artists, including Rhea Weldy, and went to work. The original had measured 378 feet in length, 38 in height. Miller's masterpiece is about 13 1/2 feet long and 35 inches high. He attached the photographs, in sections, to a canvas.

The cyclorama finally failed to draw crowds. It changed hands several times. When Miller learned the building was to be razed and the canvas taken away he decided to act.

"First I took a pencil and notebooks and gave the caretaker a cigar if he would let me in. I spent days making color charts and drawings. I also hired a photographer to copy every inch of the canvas. We finished just three days before the canvas was scheduled to come down."

After the spacious lobby has been entered, and the stairs ascended, one is suddenly ushered upon a scene embracing a battle ground of 25 square miles, the vast theater in which the events of those memorable 1st, 2nd and 3rd days of July, 1863, were staged.

The view extends to the mountains on the horizon, the effect in its preparation, the Master Artist, Marion Knight, under whose direction it was executed, controlling a corps of artists during all of that time, some of whom had even to be placed under guard, by reason of their eccentricities, until the completion of the work.

They were all specialists, some working solely upon horses, others upon men, while still others created the wonderful effects in summer by every means possible and should in Dayton. The impressions to be gained from this noble canvas are many, and the time devoted to its careful study is well spent.

If ever an object lesson on Preparedness and the results of War were needed, one visit to "The Battle of Gettysburg" will convince the most skeptical of this necessity.

There are bits of description opposite the various scenes, on the visitor's balcony, which are supplemented by the lecturer-attendant, or by George C. Lautenschlager, the proprietor and manager of this splendid attraction.

Mr. Lautenschlager has made repeated trips to the Gettysburg field, and is able to add intensely interesting and dramatic incidents compiled from acquaintances with soldiers who were in the battle, and extensive study. Helpful little souvenir booklets are distributed to visitors, which enable him to further understand the movements which controlled the fortunes of this great battle.

No trip to the Soldier's Home is complete without a visit to the "Battle of Gettysburg," which is conveniently situated on Gettysburg avenue, a short distance from either line of street cars.

BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG AT LAKESIDE PRESENTS WAR AS IT IS IN ABSOLUTE REALISM. WORLD'S GREATEST CYCLORAMA ANNUALLY ATTRACTS THOUSANDS.

(By Mabel Brown Martin.)

HOW long since you, Mr. and Mrs. Daytonian, have paid a visit to "The Battle of Gettysburg," at Lakeside Park? Confess now, wasn't your last visit paid several years ago, when you were playing more or less reluctant escort to relatives or out-of-town friends, and in duty bound, included this wonderful attraction in the hurried schedule of the day at "The Home"? You hardly were able to give it more than a glance,—perhaps you were near-cross, and your feet ached, and it is safe to say that there wasn't ample time spent for the atmosphere of this great creation to take possession of you.

But suppose now, in these big, stirring days, when everyone is talking Preparedness, and when we don't see how the first pages of the Dailies can surpass the horrors of past chronicles,—suppose now, we say, you spend an hour in real appreciation of this greatest masterpiece of its kind in the world.

Surpassing merit must surely be conceded this painting, which was first exhibited to the public on July 4th, 1867, and which has never been closed from that day on, or moved from its original location.

It is peculiarly a Dayton institution, not only by reason of its 29 years of association with the Soldiers' Home, but for the fact that only a short distance beyond, in the barracks yonder, there are gray-haired men who shared the splendours and tragedies of this three-days' engagement—unquestionably the pivotal battle of the Civil War.

They often gather in the Cyclorama Building, those veterans of shot and shell, and the chance visitor is often interested in their comments of whose hazy distance is heightened by the scenes which claim attention between,—scenes which make the breath come faster, and note. No "Movie Thriller" ever offered dramatic events of half the heart-interest that can be traced here and there upon this great panorama or intensive action.

It is not long before a sense of the unreality of the present, and a sympathetic understanding of these stirring events of the past, creeps insensibly upon the spirit, and one unconsciously becomes a part of the great spectacle unfolded before him.

HARMONIOUS FOREGROUND.

Many are amazed at the realistic effect presented by the foreground, whose arrangement is so harmoniously blended with the picture, that it is difficult to tell where the actual trees, rail fences and stone walls terminate, and the painted ones begin.

Here and there are the red coals of a campfire, whose charred embers seem about to quicken into a blaze. In the dust, are flung about in confusion knapsacks, canteens, saddles and guns,—these, by the way, being actual trophies of the great battle, gathered on the field of Gettysburg.

Life-sized silhouettes of men, horses, cannon and gun carriages, startlingly true to life, mingle imperceptibly with those in the picture. These effects can only be appreciated by being seen, and arouse wonder by their faithful reproduction.

TREMENDOUS SCOPE.

The tremendous scope of this work is impressed upon the observer by degrees, and the artistic value of the exhibition, without a peer of its kind in the world, begins to be appreciated.

Consider, if you will, that at least six months were consumed trees whose leaves seem only to await a breeze to set them swaying.

COMPOSITE EFFECT.

How, with so many wielding the brush in this master-conception, on canvases of such heroic size, the effect is one of such complete unity, has been the marvel of artists from all over the world, who have stood in humility before this great work!

And there have been hundreds of these,—artists of note from all over America and countries across the sea, who have despaired of ever obtaining such delicate effects of cloud, such contrasts of light and shade, and such vigor of action as are found in this galaxy of stirring events.

There have been artists who came for weeks just to study horses, others the figures, and so it goes, men whose judgment the world has valued, have gone into ecstasies over this great painting, which many Daytonians have never yet seen at all!

ITS SIZE.

The entire cost of "The Battle of Gettysburg," which is the only cyclorama of its kind in the world, was $30,000. It consumes 16,000 square feet of canvas, being 40 feet high, and 320 feet in circumference. One is compelled to wonder at the perfection with which the colors of 29 years ago defy Father Time. Every ounce of color in this massive production was imported from England, the total cost of the paint alone being over $10,000.

This is the only known example of Marion Knight's work in existence, a similar cyclorama which he once executed in Chicago being long ago disintegrated. Many Daytonians will also recall his scene from the Chariot Race in Ben Hur, on the old Park theater curtain, which has also vanished with the flight of time.

The work is valuable from the historical, artistic and symbolical standpoint, and should be paid respectful visits during the present

Frederick Wilhelm Heine spent the first 40 years of his life in Germany. He was a war correspondent and sketch artist with the Prussian Army in Austria and a field artist in the Franco-Prussian War. Because of his reputation as a war artist in Germany, Heine was invited to come to Milwaukee to supervise the figure painting section of the American Panorama Company.
